Hongkong, April 28th, 1873.

Our evening contemporary recently made some apposite remarks with reference to desirability of having some proper system of making the laws of the Colony known to the Chinese. The subject is not a new one, but Captain had brought an action alleging that case at the Police Court with reference to could show that the ship was not worth what kerosine, in which it was quite evident that the natives had not had a proper opportunity of case in question, however, was suggestive in, a scarcely less degree of the necessity of more as that concerning dangerous substances generally known to the public. Not only which had to be fulfilled here, process could the Chinese, but the Europeans concerned in under ordinary circumstances be adopted to the matter, had acted in ignorance of the law, the case of Cookney v. Anderson, 11 Weekly and it was clear that they were at least morally excusable, notwithstanding that ignoronce of the law is no excuse legally.

Ordinances such as that with reference to dangerous substances, are in reality much more in the nature of municipal regulations than laws, and ought to be notified to the public in a manner which will feally leave no reasonable room to be ignorant of them. notification in the Gazette calling specific attention to the regulations, would be the least that could be considered to meet this requirement; but in order that the public might be produced. Some further discussion should be fairly treated in such matters there ought also to be some intimation given General went on to allude to the second writ of in the local papers, in the same way as is foreign attachment, which he applied to have always considered necessary in respect to bankrupteies. It is not to be supposed that ginated on a sub-obarter made in Sydney. In everybody in the Colony can be acquainted with the multifarious ordinances which are passed; and when these ordinances necessitate the adoption of some specific line of action, it seems only reasonable that the fact should be definitely made known.

The principle that ignorance of the laws is no excuse does not apply in spirit to such matters as this, though it may appear to do so technically. The broad principles of law will know when he is likely to invade them. and act with caution or take advice acto suspect the existence of a special municipal regulation, unless such unimpossible not to be aware of its existence. ing all legal dicta, cannot but be felt to be the public that they should be adopted. If to Pustan & Co. we had some system of Municipal Government in the Colony, a vast amount of what is now done by the heavy form of Ordinances, which, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, are supposed not to alter, could be effected by notifications issued from time to time by the Municipal Authorities, as the public necessities seemed to require them. As it is, we go through all the formality of framing Ordinances concerning trees, small birds, lamps and a variety of other details. and when the regulations are framed, it is found that a large number of people know nothing about them, and that the means here out of a question of prize money in 1859,

On Saturday the 29th, leaving the officers to make enquiries about the lorcha, we started away to have a reconnoitie of the surrounding country. We were anchored about five miles from the mouth of the river, and about ten from Wenshow, in a river wider than our Shanghai one, muddier and swifter in its tide current. The laud on either bank is a level strip of paddy fields, with lofty mountains behind, which gradually close in on the strips of plain, obliterating it altogether above Weochow, where the river enters the hills. The hills rocky and barren, one long lofty range sbutting out the view of everything behind it. On the right, ranges were piled on ranges, throwing out spurs and ridges in all directions, out up by deep ravines and in many parts covered. trees. The general appearance of these being much more attractive than that of the other side, and the plains beneath being more extensive, we determined to make our explorations on the right bank.

We struck over the plain for the nearest ridge. The plain was the usual chess-board of paddy fields with stone paths between that one finds all over southern China, but with a most ertensive water system of ponds and canals. The water in these has no tidals raise and fall, and is beautifully clear, so it is not supplied from the mountain torrents and streams. Patches of wheat and barley were in car, a good average crop. Here and there were kilns where. ovater shells and rice busks were being calcined together, the necessary heat being kept up by a gigantic bellows, with a flapping valve like our ordinary kitchen apparatus, and worked by two men. What the result is I don't know, unless it be to reduce the line carbonate to oxide, in which form it would be available for either manure or building purposes.

At the foot of the first spur was a village, with a considerable smack of old Holland about it, built on the banks of a well kept canal, over covered with real English ivy. In these and had conscorated little shrines in their branches to the local deities. The boats on the canals were painted in the most gandy colours, and as clean as Shanghai sampaus-in fact the only exception to the general cleanliness of the place was the people themselves. The bill system rises from the plain very abruptly and presents a front of alternated heablands and bays which mark it as the former seashore, and there is abundance of evidence to show that the We whow plain as a recent formation, and that it is even now fast extending itself at the expense of the sea. From the top of ridge No. 2 we could see our bill at last, two ridges beyond, and we managed by a long detour to wriggle ourselves round to its base without having to get down into the awkward looking gullies that intervened, somewhat to the detriment of divers terrace walls and ten shrubs. A long pull brought us out of the regions of terrace and tea, into those of bare sornb and stones, another long pull or rather creep, and we were at sun had been too much for me and I had tolie down for a little, fearing if I moved a limb I should go rolling down 3,000 feet. The Envoy to show that there was lots of standing room on The daily perambulation of the Bubbling Well Road has unfitted me however for peaks, and it was some time before I gained confidence to look up. The envoy in the meantime was taking the brarings of the country with a pocket compass, sketching prominent land-marke, humming Runky Dorum and otherwise behaving rationally. All round were hills on hills, simply one mass of tea gardens, beyond was the plain of mountains, was the sea. There is no doubt that Wenchow is par excellence the port of the black tea country, for it is surrounded by the hills of the country, with the foot of which it is connected by good canals. The ed; and support a population which would take our goods in return for their produce, and in addition to its convenience as a centre of business, it would be the most charming and romantio residence in the East, with a Holland, and Scotland and a Switzerland all within easy driving distance. There is next to no bar, four to five fathoms at the shallowest part, and the largest foreign ships could lie within three miles of the city, the only drawback being the tide current, which would make loading and unloading from lighters a rather difficult operation. If it is an advantage that greater facilities for buying tea should exist, which many will question, then the sooner Weachow is opened the better, for there every teataster may have his own gurden, if he likes. and may superintend the growth of the teas he

The Taotai had in our absence sent a wei yuan to appoint an interview with the Envoy. and request us not to go on shore, as the people were ferocious to a terrible degree. We' had beard the same story at Shanghai, and I am glad to be able to contradict it. From everyone, gentle and simple, we received a most cordial welcome, and the independent bearing of all made this the more apparent, a-bearing which showed that the slightest insult would be returned with interest, as readily as an English labourer would knock a foreigner down if he threw a stone at his bull terrier. We met with only one exception, and that was an old bag from whom we asked a glass of water. In reply she shricked and howled the most borrible oaths, seized her crutch, and wanted to whack us both out of her house. The Envoy, baving some little skill in southern dialects, could just make out that a foreigner whose aucestors were suything but virtuous, and whose mother and sisters were vile, had stolen -a bamboo out of her grove. We beat a rapid retreat before this old bedlamite, and I am still under the impression that, of the three or four nice old ladies I know in this world, none are Chinese. If my enemies wish me ill, they can easily reach me even when they are at a distance—canning and cowardice have long arms." "I am surprised at your composure," said Reigin; "and I confess plainly that I would not be so composed in your place." "Every one is brave in his own way," said the king.

While they went on thus they heard something chirping plaintively in a tree close by. "It is a bird," said Reigin. "It is not -singing," said the king; "it is in pain." "It must remain so, then," said the earl; "we have other things to think about just now." "Nothing better for the present." the king answered, and looked up into the tree. "It's impossible to save it," continued learned to climb a tree in Vifil's Island. said the king, "and I am not so old yet as to have forgot." "There are no branches by down on the trunk," said the carl. "Then you'll have to lift me," cried the king. "I'm a little man—I'm not heavy to lift. "But if you were to fall and kill yourself," said the earl, "it would be an eternal shame for people to say you had lost your life for a bird!" "Many lose their lives for less," said Hroar. And now the stiff, thick-set earl had to lift the little, active king on his shoulders, and thence Hroar clambered up the tree, and ventured out upon the farthest branches. He came down all right with the little siskin, which had got its leg caught in a narrow fissure, where it was imprisoned, and could not flatter itself loose. "It shall be my foster-child, and Agnar's playfellow," said the king, and he took it home with him and made Vanlundur weave a beautiful cage for it. "How childish!" said some of his warriors, who were true to the king, but despised his actions. "At the moment when strife is at his threshold and his own life in danger, he busies himself with a bird, and takes care of it. Is he not running carelessly to his own destruction? Poor Hroar you will surely full a victim to the Goths' Meanwhile the thirst for vengeance had not fallen asleep. Hroar's fall was determined; he had discovered the Goths' secret -had their fate in his band. They had secretly sworn his death. By promises and threats they had gained two bondmen, who served him in his sleeping chamber, to their side. Ralf had promised them freedom and lands if they would help; if not, he assured them that they would be chosen on the first opportunity to wash the goldess' image in the grove. They knew what that meant. Thus, one day when the king was hunting with his men, they loosened an oak beam in the root of his sleeping-room over his bed, and artfully made it hang fast so, that they could, from he was a young man he enjoyed fun and the upper story let it fall by means of a string. The habit of keeping accounts to some people seems the only possible way of saving themselves from waste and debt, while others pooh pooh it as a piece of useless pedantry. And it is quite true that if the money is spent, writing down in a book how it is spent will not get it back again. It is also true that for private individuals, at the end of every year, at the risk of their own temper and the comfort of their family, and the loss of much precious time to insist on balancing their accounts to a haltpenny, is a kind of financial prudery which fall respect to Charles Simeon notwithstanding) good sense will usually repudiate as utterly needless. Amazed and puzzled at General colour—the spires, towers, and folty palaces, himself upon her body, supposing that life Bee's unmistakable ignorance of his identity, with the river which divides the city in two, had fled; and Mr. Templeton was drilled into Wise advanced quite close to him and said are bathed in a ruddy glow, gradually the manner in which he should so manage rather stiffly, "Good morning, General Lee." melting into cooler tints, until all vanishes to conceal the necessary arrangement, that It is very early and very cool, too—a sharp ject becomes again distinctly visible, and hand put the foaming powter through the gaze relaxed, a smile appeared in its place, town and country seem to repose in peaceful stage to be swallowed at a draught, and the smile deepened, broadened, and, spreadsiumber, only broken in the spring-time by success was wou! Well might the writer ing from feature to feature, ended at last in the song of the nightingale, the gentle cry above quoted have said that the finale must a fit of the most immoderate and uncontrol-

dens around, and the loud and continuous man could use can ever describe how it was | Astounded beyond words, and indignant chirrup of the mole-cricket, whilst myritds delivered. Malibran, however, had not over- beyond measure at such a reception, it was of fireflies flash among the ilex and olives, estimated her own strongth. She knew it some time before General Wise could dethe vines and young corn-From " Walks wanted but this fillip to carry her through. mand an explanation. During all this time She had resolved to have an encore, and she General Lee laughed as a mature man rarely fore. On the repetition of the opera and laughter and yet dried, was simple enough. When Hroar had parted from Vidrik, he afterwards, a different arrangement of the General Lee had taken the General for a took his usual walk in the Ledre wood with stage was made, and a property calabash Comanche Indian. He had lost his hat or Earl Reigin. Reigin had a great deal to containing a pot of porter was used; but cap, a dirty blanket was thrown over his say to him on the way. He was the king's although the same result was constantly won, shoulders to protect him from the keen morntrue friend, and was troubled at the number | Malibran always said it was not half so "nice," | ing air, and his face, washed in a mud puddle of enemies who daily increased in the king's nor did her anything like the good it would and hastily wiped, retained a ring of red own palace; he advised him to consider what have done if she could only have had it out mud around the borders, which made the measures should be taken against this, and of the pewter. - From "Musical Recollections resemblance to an Indian as exact as well could be—all the more so in consequence of Wise's strong features.

Barely sufficient at the time (so incensed was Wise,) the explanation eventually proved called self-evident. Illness, misfortune, the ample, for General Wise now laughs at this opportunity of an eligible purchase putting incident as heartly as any one, and often out children into the world, the inevitable relates it himself, while it may well be growth of expenditure as we advance in life. | doubted whether ever again in life General the immense comfort of a secret provision | Lee found either the occasion or the disposifor emergencies, are quite sufficient in them- tion to relax his wonted gravity.—Lip-
